But what about users with a weaker social graph?

Another JBTD (Growth: Resurrection):

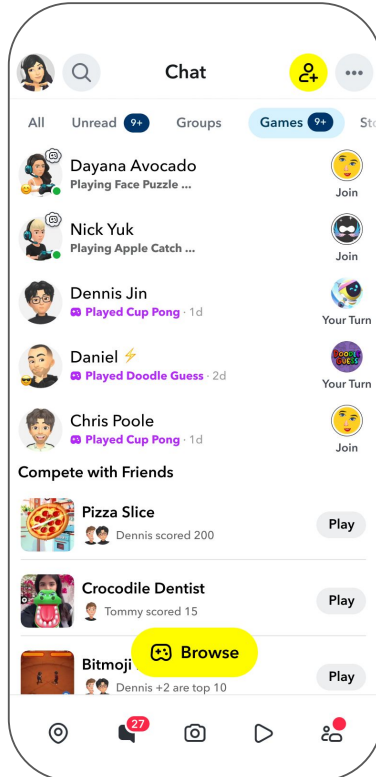

Get more Snapchatters to open the app each day

Games may be able to help with this for users with a weaker social graph.

These surfaces would house social games:

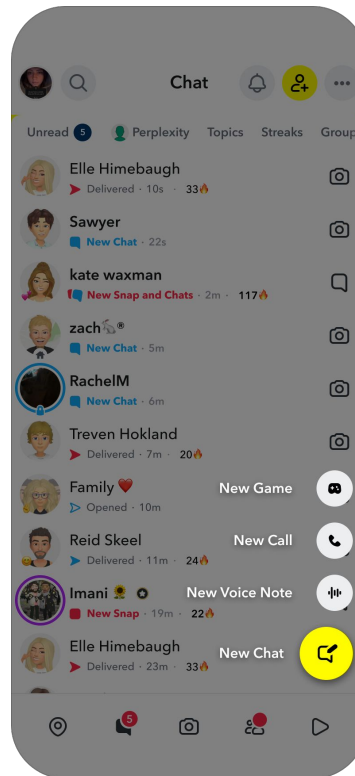

- Live multiplayer
- Turn-based
- Leaderboards

For users with weaker social graphs or who are waiting for a response from their friends...

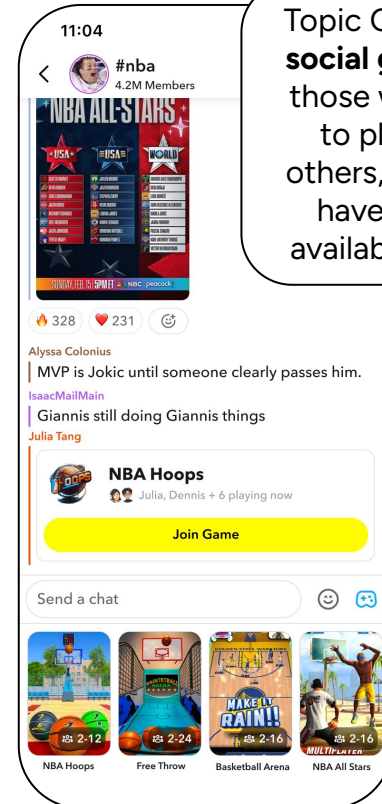

Content surfaces (Discover + Spotlight) serve the “solo-play” / passive browsers, with retentive games/daily challenges that bring people back

Topic Chats
(with chat-relevant games)

Topic Chats with social games for those who want to play with others, but don't have friends available to play

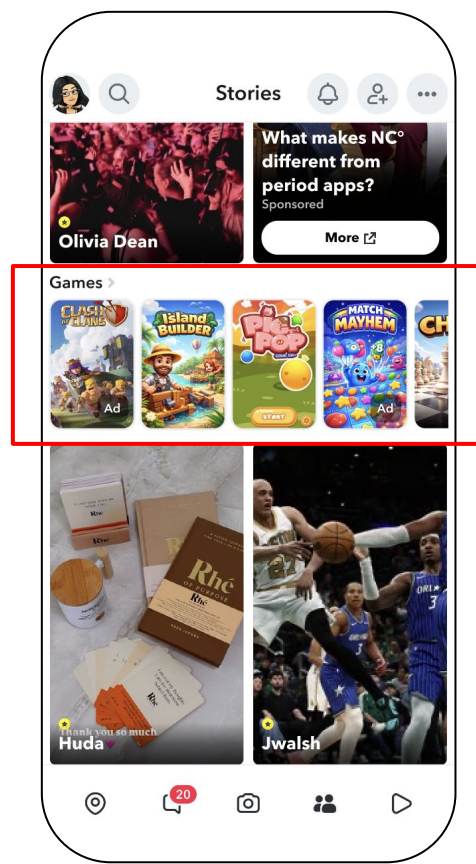

We need to align on a stationary entry point to the Games storefront for “solo” players on Discover

A pinned pill (confusing UX)

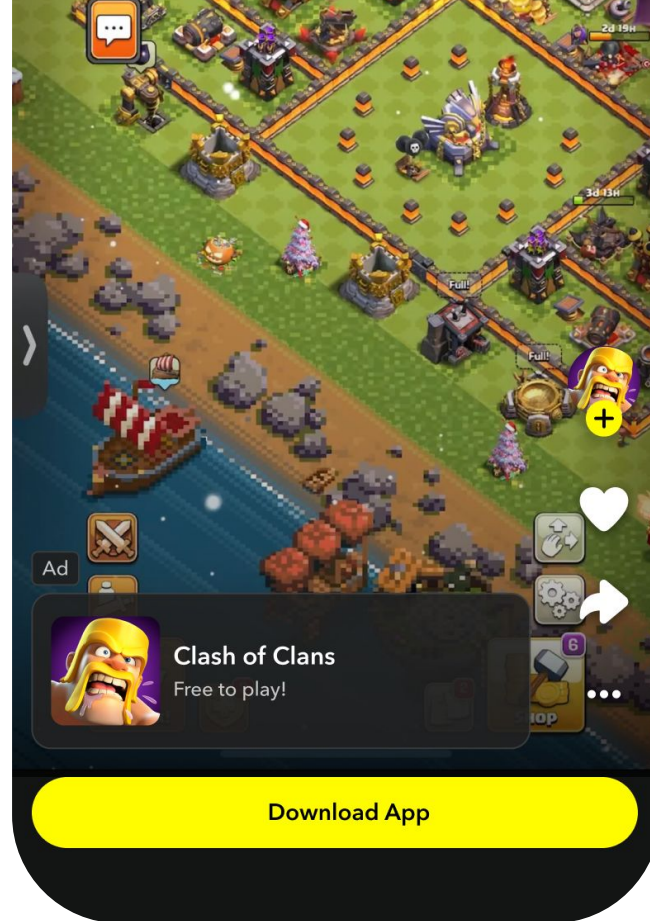

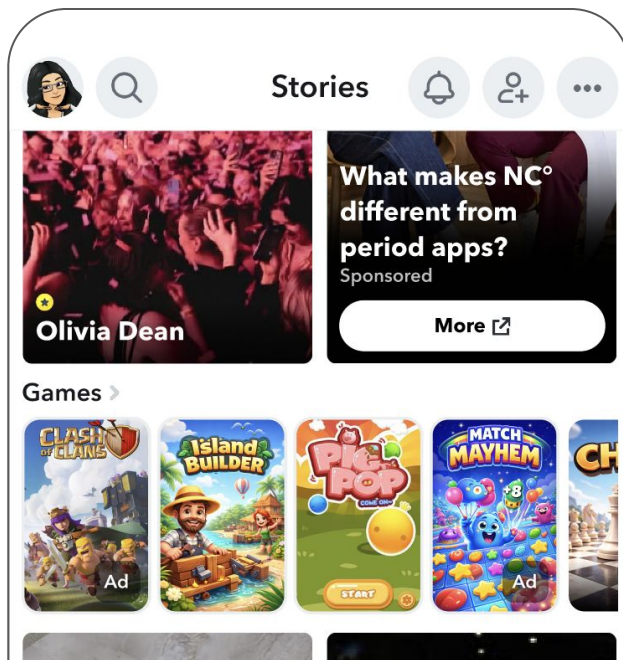

A pinned tile (too disruptive to page)

Pinned carousel component

A bonus benefit of Games presence on content surfaces is that they become a natural home for playable game ads, which we know are very successful
